Guidelines to Write Status report

Gather information
Before you begin, gather all the information that you want to include your project status update email. This data may come from team members, management, the client, reports or project management software. Look at broader topics, like the project timeline and upcoming important dates, and more specific topics, so you have a good understanding of all the different aspects of the project's current state.

2. Find or create a template
Search for a status report template that is ready to use or that you can alter to fit your needs. You can also create your own custom template that fits your style and the information you plan to share.

3.Work on an outline
For your first progress status update email, it may be helpful to start with an outline. Go through each topic in your template and write down a few words in each section to organize your thoughts and make sure you have dedicated sections for the information you want to include.

4. Draft and edit
Write the first draft of your progress status update email. Once you've finished the first draft, try to take a break so you can return to it with a new perspective. Next, review your email for errors, ensure the information is accurate and attach any documents or links.

5. Send it at the right time
Try to send your email around the same time every day before leaving office or work. If you have daily stand-ups or weekly update meetings, it might be helpful to send the email prior to the meeting so everyone has the same information to discuss. You could also create your update during the meeting and send it afterward so all members have a summary to refer to.

Key Points:

1. All Status report should be sent EOD (End of the day) without fail.
2. Don’t send fresh Emails everyday need to maintain same email thread every day.

What is Email Thread?

An email thread is a single email conversation that starts with an original email, the beginning of the conversation, and includes all of the subsequent replies and forwards pertaining to that original email.

An email thread is one email conversation that contains a series of messages and replies. Email correspondences are grouped together in a threaded email instead of showing all emails individually. The sequence of emails is automatically arranged in chronological order to ensure the most recent reply is at the top.
